Building and Supporting Healthy Communities for All

The National Public Health Law Conference is organized by:

The National Public Health Law Conference is a premier event, attracting more than 500 attendees from across the country who are decision makers and practitioners in public health and other sectors. Join leading programs and organizations like the Bloomberg American Health Initiative and the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation to sponsor the conference and help empower the public health community by supporting training and education for officials, policymakers, attorneys, practitioners and advocates in critical areas. To view the preliminary conference schedule and other information, visit phlc2020.org.

We are seeking organizations whose objectives strongly align with the object of the conference: to equip those working to improve the health of their communities with the knowledge and tools needed in their work to address some of our country's biggest health challenges. Issues and topics examined at the conference include social and structural barriers to health equity, healthy environments and climate resiliency, drug harm reduction, injury prevention, data sharing, and child and adolescent health. Help us welcome conference attendees to Baltimore!
